COMMENT BY THE PORTFOLIO MANAGER

Markets in general

July saw global markets experience some profit-taking, predominantly led by large tech companies. This year, markets have been highly sensitive to inflation data, expected FED policy, and interest rates. However, this month's movements were less about economic data or rates. Macro data confirmed a recent disinflation trend, and interest rates traded lower for the fourth consecutive month. Instead, a shift in risk appetite and sentiment triggered profit-taking after over two months of optimism and new all-time highs.

A significant catalyst was the assassination attempt on Mr. Trump and President Biden's decision not to seek re-election this fall, instead appointing Kamala Harris as the new Democratic presidential candidate. Despite these events, forward-looking macro data and corporate quarterly results did not indicate a severe economic slowdown. Market sentiment, closely tied to earnings outlook and economic strength, remained cautious. As long as the labour market appears healthy, we remain relatively confident.

Sector Performance: Energy Transition

Energy Transition sectors faced weakness in June due to sentiment impacted by policy risks in both Europe and the US. A weaker USD and renewed risk appetite at the start of July led to a brief rebound in our sector. However, the sentiment soured again due to the aforementioned factors and a stronger USD, causing another sell-off.

Our sector has been range-bound since January's selloff, trading in line with October's lows last year and significantly lower than a year ago. From most perspectives, sector sentiment is weak, underperforming US large tech companies, large-cap, value, and defensive sectors worldwide. Valuations have dropped to levels not seen since 2018, reflecting sector struggles. High interest rates have disrupted many companies reliant on CapEx and debt financing, compounded by sector-specific challenges.

Despite this, we find reasons for optimism. The mid-term outlook of lower rates and low-cost equipment production, driven by overcapacity and low prices on materials like polysilicon and lithium, are encouraging. Technological advancements in EVs, heat pumps, wind turbines, batteries, carbon capture, and Solar PV are making the Energy Transition more efficient and cost-effective. Corporates are progressing with their ESG agendas, Gen-AI is driving clean power demand, and old power assets, mainly coal-fired, are being phased out. While supportive policies are helpful, they are less critical compared to a decade ago. Our sector needs to recover for a valuation re-rating, which will significantly impact markets and stock prices.

We believe long-term value lies in growth companies rather than defensive ones. Future mega-cap companies in this sector will emerge, similar to the tech sector, though not necessarily from current large players. We favour enablers over adopters. Thus, our investment strategy remains flexible, seeking long-term value without rigid rules. We are long-term optimistic and cautiously optimistic in the short-term. Lower rates, supportive inflation data, moderating wages, and lower oil prices provide a favourable environment. If risk appetite returns broadly, our sector and fund are well-positioned for a strong recovery.

COMMENT BY THE PORTFOLIO MANAGER

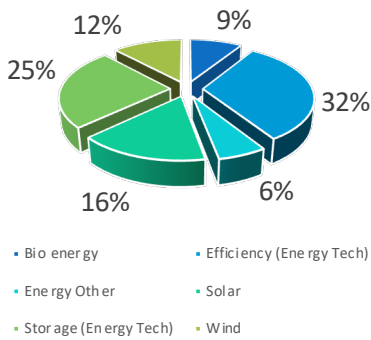

Proxy performance

The Fund returned 5.02% in July for the EUR A share class.

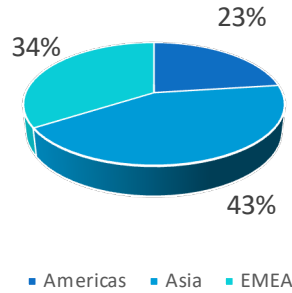

After a weak June, the sector and our alpha generation improved in July. The Solar PV and hydrogen sectors had particularly strong months, with investments in companies like Enphase, First Solar, Daqo, Hexagon Purus, Hexagon Composites, and Bloom Energy delivering double-digit returns. Our Asian investments were relatively flat but have generated alpha year-to-date. Prioritizing companies with robust technology, product offerings, superior production management, and strong domestic exposure has paid off, as seen with BYD, CATL, and Nari Tech. We exited our investment in the UK-based DRAX Group after recent strong performance.

Overall, our portfolio is well-positioned for a "low growth – lower rates" environment with increasing demand for Energy Transition technologies in the mid-term perspective.
